The Veda, Sankhya, and Yoga

The fundamental knowledge of the Bhagavad Gita. The Sankhya system: the degrees of the Prakriti; Purusha; the three gunas, their resonance in Aristotle and their rebirth in Goethe's color theory. The task of Yoga: the regaining of the lost spirituality through devotional exercises. The Bhagavad Gita as the poetry and teaching of a time in transition.

pages 16–34

4.

The Essence of the Bhagavad Gita and the Significance of the Pauline Letters

COLOGNE, DECEMBER 31, 1912

The Bhagavad Gita as the flower of former developments, the letters of Paul as the seed of future developments. The transitional period characterized by the deed of Krishna: the falling away of blood-bound clairvoyance. The transition to a higher stage of development through the Christ impulse: the soul-element taking hold from within and the confrontation with Lucifer and Ahriman.

pages 55–74

Indian philosophy turning away from Maya. The Christian search for the spiritual in the world as the work of the gods. The being and deed of Christ; Krishna as His “shining light.” The path of reconciliation of the human being with the world through self knowledge and self-education.

PART II
THE ESOTERIC MEANING OF THE BHAGAVAD GITA

1.

HELSINKI, MAY 28, 1913

The recognition of the Bhagavad Gita and its relevance for the present time. A statement on this by Wilhelm von Humboldt. The starting-point of the Bhagavad Gita: a battle of brothers. The reluctance of Arjuna to be involved in worldly battle. The opposite picture of Socrates as proclaimer of the immortality of the soul. Arjuna as the representative of the world of the group soul, and Krishna as the leader for the experience of the individual ego.

HELSINKI, MAY 29, 1913

The artistic composition of all ancient documents of the esoteric. A shattering soul experience as the starting point of esoteric experiences. Widening of interest as a prerequisite of spiritual training. Arjuna's spiritual development in accordance with such prerequisites. Thinking in general concepts as a new acquisition at the time of the Bhagavad Gita. Ideas and concepts as the beginning of clairvoyance. The teaching of Krishna: turning away from the word of the Vedas, and turning toward treading the path of Yoga. Undergoing the feeling of solitude and the first steps to super-sensible knowledge.

HELSINKI, MAY 30, 1913

The connection of dream pictures with everyday experiences. The intrusion of spiritual experiences into the world of dreams as a result of spiritual-scientific practices. The overcoming of the usual sympathies and antipathies as a pre-condition for such experiences. Examples of the difficulties of achieving this. Attaining a new attitude to one's own destiny. The necessity of strengthening self-awareness for the ascent into higher worlds. The reflection of such facts in the meeting between Arjuna and Krishna.

HELSINKI, MAY 31, 1913

The last remains of clairvoyance in people at the time of the Bhagavad Gita. The feeling of the senselessness of a merely physical existence as a spur to spiritual research. The attainment of higher knowledge through conscious penetration into the region of the spirit world otherwise only experienced during sleep. The recognition of the necessity of evil in the world. The indignation of public criticism towards insights brought down from the "sleep region." The truth of the two Jesus children as an example. The words of Krishna as revelations from this spiritual region.

HELSINKI, JUNE 1, 1913

The deficiency of all definitions. Characterization of the cyclic course of the processes of upbuilding and degradation in the nervous system through the alternation of sleeping and waking. Helen Keller as example for the resilience of hereditary forces against organic damage. The cyclic law of life in the course of history and alternation between periods of preparation and of fulfillment. The formation of a new organ in the human brain between the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries and the beginning of spiritualistic thinking in the present. Examples of the after effects of a materialistically superficial mode of thinking. Woodrow Wilson's views on national life. The preparation of self-consciousness through Krishna during the time of division into castes and ancestor worship. Arjuna's becoming conscious of this process.

HELSINKI, JUNE 2, 1913

An error of today's abstract scientific knowledge: the interpretation of ancient religious documents as philosophical systems. The meeting of Arjuna with Krishna as bringing about self-consciousness. The artistic crescendo of the first songs of the Bhagavad Gita to the ninth song: from comprehension of the eternal through outer phenomena to deepening in Yoga, to experiencing the Krishna spirit in imaginative pictures. The meaning of the Krishna impulse for the individual human soul, of the Christ impulse for all humanity.

HELSINKI, JUNE 3, 1913

The inability of the human being to recognize his own powers of cognition. The working of the destructive forces in the waking life of thinking and the creative up-building forces during sleep. The special quality of these forces in the human being; their relationship to the “less than nothing”. The sleep of the reproductive forces in innocent childhood and their animalizing effect when they awaken during puberty. The protection of these human creative forces from Lucifer’s influence in the sister soul of Adam. The becoming human of this soul in the Jesus child of the Luke Gospel. Its penetration by the Zarathustrian soul of the other Jesus child during puberty. The working of Adam’s soul in the Krishna impulse. The discovery of these facts through esoteric observation and not by rational construction.

HELSINKI, JUNE 4, 1913

The emergence of the Bhagavad Gita out of the perceptual mode of ancient India. The lack of understanding its more profound contents. The efforts to renew the ancient Indian wisdom through the Sankhya philosophy and the Vedanta philosophy of Shankaracharya. The relationship of this spiritual stream with the philosophy of Soloviev, Fichte and Hegel. The perception of the Bhagavad Gita expressed in the concepts sattva, rajas, and tamas. The vivacity of these concepts and their application to various areas of life.

HELSINKI, JUNE 5, 1913

The different application of the concepts sattva, rajas, and tamas at the time of the Bhagavad Gita and the present. Growing beyond these three soul conditions as the task of Arjuna. Krishna’s impulse for the independence and perfection of the human soul. The synthesis of the Luciferic impulse through the Christ impulse. The widespread error in the Theosophical Society of the physical reincarnation of Christ and the striving for truthfulness as the task of Anthroposophy.

pages 198–213

APPENDIX: From The Gospel of St. Mark

BASEL, LECTURE 5, SEPTEMBER 19, 1912

Buddha and his predecessor Krishna. Krishna's teachings as esoteric revelations. Teachings of modern idealist philosophers as equally "esoteric" but conceptual in the post-Christian era. In Vedas and Bhagavad Gita, Krishna's teachings summarized a world perceived by ancient clairvoyance in the third cultural epoch before loss of clairvoyance. Buddha's teachings some centuries later show nostalgia for the lost world of Krishna. Buddha looked backward to Krishna, John the Baptist looked forward to Christ.
